

Sara showed her true colors when the new girl asked to play with her at recess.

Mom read me the riot act when she found out I had been watching cartoons for two hours and my room was still a mess.

If they needed help at the local animal shelter, I would volunteer at the drop of a hat.

“Where is your homework?” asked the teacher. “And don’t beat around the bush.”

We were really down to the wire before our group project started coming together.

When I questioned my little brother about my missing goldfish, he clammed up.

I studied all night and was climbing the walls the morning of my exam.

He flew off the handle when he was told there were no seats left on the flight.

My mom lets us have soda only once in a blue moon.

I didn't think that the roofer they hired was worth his salt.

He had egg on his face after losing the argument.

I was so tired that I felt like I was being a wet blanket at the party.

I am still on the fence about the president's new policies.

I wondered if my mom would grant my request for a raise in my weekly allowance, but the handwriting was on the wall.

My little brother will cry wolf over the littlest things.

The boy is the spitting image of his father.

I'm going to try not to spill the beans about my grandparents' surprise anniversary party.

My book report was due on Monday, and by Sunday night I was behind the eight ball.

“Well, somebody got up on the wrong side of the bed,” my sister teased.

Winning the invention competition was a real feather in my cap.

When my brother took the last cupcake as I was reaching for it, I thought, “I’ll fix his wagon.”

I did not mince my words when Mom asked me if I liked her new purple and orange dress.

I explained to my group what we still needed to get done, but it seemed to go in one ear and out the other.

It wasn't fair that he pulled a few strings to get one of the new laptop models before it was even released to the public.

Learning to do the backstroke this summer was a piece of cake.

When I went to my favorite author's book signing, I couldn't believe how down-to-earth she seemed.

By June there was only one spot left in the karate class that I wanted to take, but I missed the boat on that one.

Coach always tells us to fight the urge to throw in the towel, no matter what.

Even though I enjoy acting on stage, I don't always like to be in the limelight.

I passed my physical fitness test with flying colors.

It was still a toss-up which movie we were going to go see.

I bit off more than I could chew when I took on a six-hour babysitting job.

It was so much fun when our gym teacher let her hair down and played kickball with us.

My dad told me to keep my chin up when I didn't make the football team.

After I gave Mom my great report card, I decided to strike while the iron was hot and ask if I could go on a camping trip with my friends.

Sara showed her true colors when the new girl asked to play with her at recess.

Mom read me the riot act when she found out I had been watching cartoons for two hours and my room was still a mess.

If they needed help at the local animal shelter, I would volunteer at the drop of a hat.

“Where is your homework?” asked the teacher. “And don’t beat around the bush.”

We were really down to the wire before our group project started coming together.

When I questioned my little brother about my missing goldfish, he clammed up.

I studied all night and was climbing the walls the morning of my exam.

He flew off the handle when he was told there were no seats left on the flight.

My mom lets us have soda only once in a blue moon.

I didn't think that the roofer they hired was worth his salt.

He had egg on his face after losing the argument.

I was so tired that I felt like I was being a wet blanket at the party.

I am still on the fence about the president's new policies.

I wondered if my mom would grant my request for a raise in my weekly allowance, but the handwriting was on the wall.

My little brother will cry wolf over the littlest things.

The boy is the spitting image of his father.

I'm going to try not to spill the beans about my grandparents' surprise anniversary party.

My book report was due on Monday, and by Sunday night I was behind the eight ball.

“Well, somebody got up on the wrong side of the bed,” my sister teased.

Winning the invention competition was a real feather in my cap.

When my brother took the last cupcake as I was reaching for it, I thought, “I’ll fix his wagon.”

I did not mince my words when Mom asked me if I liked her new purple and orange dress.

I explained to my group what we still needed to get done, but it seemed to go in one ear and out the other.

It wasn't fair that he pulled a few strings to get one of the new laptop models before it was even released to the public.

Learning to do the backstroke this summer was a piece of cake.

When I went to my favorite author's book signing, I couldn't believe how down-to-earth she seemed.

By June there was only one spot left in the karate class that I wanted to take, but I missed the boat on that one.

Coach always tells us to fight the urge to throw in the towel, no matter what.

Even though I enjoy acting on stage, I don't always like to be in the limelight.

I passed my physical fitness test with flying colors.

It was still a toss-up which movie we were going to go see.

I bit off more than I could chew when I took on a six-hour babysitting job.

It was so much fun when our gym teacher let her hair down and played kickball with us.

My dad told me to keep my chin up when I didn't make the football team.

After I gave Mom my great report card, I decided to strike while the iron was hot and ask if I could go on a camping trip with my friends.